You don't really need a car to get there.

Los Angeles has a reputation of being a driver's city, but if you're a non-driver or balk at the cost of car rental, it's actually easy to get around without one. And while there are hotels right at the park, we stayed as guests of The Garland hotel on our press trip, which has its own trolley that takes guests to and from Universal Studios. (My 7-year-old was also thrilled at the prospect of having her own bunk bed in the hotel room, which was cordoned off in its own area with its own TV.) Head down for an early breakfast at The Front Yard, the Garland's on-site restaurant, and you're likely to see lots of little Marios, Luigis and Peaches dining before all heading out on the trolley together.

The Garland trolley runs approximately once an hour.

Once you get to Universal, there are trams that go between the Universal CityWalk — the shopping center outside the gates of the theme park — and the Los Angeles Metro. It's right on the line that can take you to popular sightseeing destinations like the Hollywood Walk of Fame, TCL Chinese Theater and the bus to the Griffith Observatory. You can save that gas money and use it on souvenirs.
